Most Americans oppose Congress overturning state animal welfare laws.

California and Massachusetts voters passed laws requiring minimum standards for the treatment of animals raised for veal, pork, and eggs sold within their states. These standards ensure that calves, pigs, and hens have enough space to stand up, lie down, turn around, and fully extend their limbs.

Some in Congress are trying to overturn these state laws claiming increased costs and contending that states shouldn't tell producers how to raise their animals in order to sell within their borders. Opponents to Congress overturning these laws argue that voters have the right to pass laws improving the treatment of animals and that these laws benefit family farmers who raise animals responsibly.
